Save the Blue-throated Hillstar

Urgent action needed for newly discovered species

COUNTRY: ECUADOR
LAND: 70,000 ACRES
TARGET: £30,000

The newly discovered Blue-throated Hillstar is already in critical danger of extinction.

Recognised by its glittering, ultramarine blue throat, this hummingbird is a very rare sighting that can only be experienced deep in the mountains in southern Ecuador, on a few remote mountaintops also home to Spectacled Bear, Mountain Tapir and Andean Condor.

But this unique páramo habitat is under threat. Mining companies have already purchased key areas for metal deposits, which would most likely be extracted through open-pit mining which would be a disaster for local wildlife.

However, our partner Naturaleza y Cultura Ecuador (NCE) and the Water National Secretariat (SENAGUA) have already been working tirelessly in this area to create a 125,000 acre (50,700 hectare) Water Protection Area, one of the highest legal categories of protection in Ecuador. With your help, it could be extended by about 70,000 acres (28,300 hectares) to include the range of the Blue-throated Hillstar thereby protecting it from mining.

Donate today to ensure that this species has a future.
